SIXTH AVENUE AND TWENTY-THIRD STREET.

HOUSE MOVED BY LIGHTER.

Old Immigrant Hospital Taken to South Brooklyn.

Loaded Whole on the Truth at the Battery.

Three hundred citizens attended the ceremonies connected with the starting of the old Immigrant Hospital on its first water voyage from the Battery this morning.

The building took passage at 10 o'clock on the good ship Truth, skipper Capt. William Logan. She was assisted in embarking by John Myers and his sons, the famous movers of buildings, of 6 Huntington street, South Brooklyn.

The lighter had been brought up and moved alongside the stone-capped bulkhead in the early morning by Skipper Logan and his men. Myers & Sons and a dozen workmen had raised the house last week with a series of blocks and jackscrews till she rested on piers seven feet above the ground and the foundations of her two chimneys. Thus she might clear the apexes of the granite points on the bulkhead. There were eight piers, each composed of sixteen timbers a foot square and five feet long.

The lighter was prepared for the reception of her distinguished passenger, by the placing of a large pile of timbers of timbers twelve inches square, and built up on the deck to a level with the galleys of the ship. These timbers are called "kisks."

The two timbers stretched across the lighter from edge to edge, and the upper surface was literally greased with soap. Under the house, and other timbers, stretching out over the lighter. They were also spaced to a condition of slipperiness, which would insure a graceful sliding of the passenger when urged by the two-hundred hawsers attached to the timbers of the house.

The hawsers ran through a pulley block attached to the taffrail of the lighter on the water side, and thence were connected with a contrivance known to building movers as a "crab" or "winch."

The "crab" was far up on the shore, and its windlass was wound up, when required, by old Tom, a sturdy, gray horse, with long tassels of red and blue on his forehead and at the sides of his head. Tom's guide and master was Steve Myers, one of the "sons" of the firm.

Everything was in readiness at 9 o'clock, only the house was still a foot or more higher than its future resting place on the lighter. But the incoming tide would remedy that, and so the men waited patiently.

At 9:30 Skipper Logan's two-foot rule was applied to the space between the timbers that stretched out from under the building over those on the lighter. Then he yelled: "There's only four inches between 'em."

Ten minutes later the word was given. Steve Myers, chirped to old Tom, the horse started on a steady tramp round the crab, the hawsers tightened as the slack was wound up on the windlass, the pulley-blocks creaked, the building ground as if in resistance, and yielded to the pressure and slipped on her slippy foundations. She slid gradually about half an inch on the timbers across the chasm of thirty feet between her resting place and the bulkhead of the lighter.

It took just twenty minutes to accomplish this. It was a superhuman feat, and it was accomplished by the skillful management of the men on the shore, and the steady tramp of the horse.

But it was not all over yet. The building had to be moved another four inches. This was accomplished by the same method, and the building was now resting on the timbers of the lighter.

The building was now resting on the timbers of the lighter. The men on the shore were now ready to move it again, but the tide was coming in, and the building was now resting on the timbers of the lighter.
